Google just gave Sundar Pichai a $692M pay package

Sundar Pichai's new pay package could be worth $692 million. Per a filing first spied by the FT, Alphabet has structured a three-year deal for its Google CEO that could make him one of the highest-paid executives on the planet — but most of it is tied to performance, including new stock incentives linked to Waymo and its drone delivery venture Wing. What's striking is how little public fascination Pichai attracts compared to Google's founders. Larry Page and Sergey Brin — the second- and fourth-richest people in the world — have lately captured headlines for a different reason entirely. Both have been snapping up lavish Miami properties, widely seen as a response to California's proposed Billionaire Tax Act — a ballot initiative targeting the state's roughly 200 billionaires with a one-time 5% levy on net worth exceeding $1 billion. Page reportedly spent over $173 million on two mansions in Coconut Grove, Florida, recently, while Brin was just linked to a $51 million megamansion 14 miles away, atop two earlier purchases totaling $92 million. Pichai, by contrast, remains quietly rooted in Los Altos, California, as far as the public knows. He's a billionaire, too — the nearly sevenfold growth in Google's market cap since he took the helm in 2015 has made the stock he's accumulated along the way hugely valuable. He and his wife currently hold shares worth nearly $500 million, with another estimated $650 million sold as of last summer, per Bloomberg's calculations.

OpenAI acquires Promptfoo to secure its AI agents

 Post image

OpenAI announced Monday it has acquired Promptfoo, an AI security startup founded in 2024 to protect LLMs from online adversaries. The frontier lab said in a blog post that once the deal closes, Promptfoo's technology will be integrated into OpenAI Frontier, its enterprise platform for AI agents. The development of independent AI agents that perform digital tasks has generated excitement about productivity gains. But it's also given bad actors fresh opportunities to access sensitive data or manipulate automated systems. This deal underscores how frontier labs are scrambling to prove their technology can be used safely in critical business operations. Promptfoo was founded by Ian Webster and Michael D'Angelo to develop tools that companies can use to test security vulnerabilities in LLMs, including an open source interface and library. The company reports that its products are used by more than 25% of Fortune 500 companies. Promptfoo has raised just $23 million since its founding and was valued at $86 million after its most recent round in July 2025, according to PitchBook. OpenAI did not disclose the value of the transaction. OpenAI's post said Promptfoo's technology will allow its agent platform to perform automated red-teaming, evaluate agentic workflows for security concerns, and monitor activities for risks and compliance needs. The company also said it expects to continue building out Promptfoo's open source offering.
